THE PALM BEACH INTERNATIONAL FILM FEST AT 20

8 days of surprising films (and celebrities, too)

2015 FILM FESTIVAL HONOREE ELLAR COLTRANE

Ellar Coltrane began filming "Boyhood" at age 6. In the first years, the movie's story mostly reflected the experiences of director Richard Linklater and actor Ethan Hawke. But as he grew up, Coltrane provided more input. IFC FILMS

By the time you turn 20, your personality is pretty well formed, you've made some significant friends and you're starting to think about moving into your own home, right?

That is the way the two-decade old Palm Beach International Film Festival feels, having showcased emerging filmmakers from Nia Vardalos ("My Big Fat Greek Wedding") to documentarian Rick McKay ("Broadway: The Golden Age") and grown into a venue for independent movies and independent-minded moviegoers from around the world.

Plus, it is now announcing plans to open its own venue at the former Plaza Theatre in Manalapan.

In its formative years, the festival may have put most of its emphasis on luring celebrities here to party and pick up awards. Gradually, though, the focus has changed to the movies themselves.

Today through April 2, the film festival offers more than 100 movies and shorts we don't get to see every day – idiosyncratic, often challenging films, that go beyond mainstream Hollywood studio fare.

"As we turn 20, we're starting to see the evolution of some of the filmmakers who got their start with us," says Randi Emerman, PBIFF president and CEO.

Strong opener, memorable closer

She points with pride to Shira Piven, who dipped her toe into the world of film festival four years ago with her first feature, "Fully Loaded," which was voted that year's Audience Favorite. Piven returns now with her latest, the opening night film, "Welcome to Me," which Emerman describes as "a quirky comedy."

That would be an understatement, since it stars Kristen Wiig ("The Skeleton Twins") as an Oprah Winfrey-obsessed woman diagnosed with Borderline Personality Disorder, who wins $86 million in a lottery and buys her own way-too-frank-and-personal television talk show.

BEYOND 'BOYHOOD'

Actor recalls 'intense' emotion of seeing his life play out on film.

What do filmmaker Richard Linklater and the Palm Beach International Film Festival have in common?

They both have their eyes out for promising young talent, and they both recognized it in Ellar Coltrane.

In Linklater's case, the discovery happened 14 years ago, when he found 6-year-old Ellar and cast him in "Boyhood," perhaps the most acclaimed film of 2014. For the festival's part, the recognition comes Saturday, when it presents the Austin, Texas, native with its Shooting Star Award.

Each year for 12 years, Coltrane and the rest of the "Boyhood" cast would reunite to shoot more of the fictional tale of a boy's restless growth into his teens.

"It's been a hell of a journey," Coltrane says now. "All of the recognition and stuff has been really wonderful. That's definitely a part of why you make something like this, to kind of connect with people, to be understood and be able to understand people a bit more.

Still, he adds, "Looking back, that was never our goal necessarily. Even though the character's not me, I used a lot of myself, so it was always a way to explore what I was going through."

Even by 6, Coltrane – whose full name is Ellar Coltrane Kinney Salmon – was an experienced actor. "Yeah, I mean I did a lot of theater when I was real young, so I definitely knew that I enjoyed it," he says by phone. "I was pretty bashful, I was pretty shy, so at first I was kind of hesitant, but when I got the audition for 'Boyhood,' I had done a couple of indie films and commercials and stuff, so I was getting more comfortable with being in front of a camera."

For an unusual project like this, his audition for Linklater was unconventional. "It was just kind of a conversation," says Coltrane. "He didn't have a script written or anything. He just kind of wanted to get to know me. And five or six

OPENING NIGHT FILM:

KRISTEN WIG WIGS OUT IN 'WELCOME TO ME'

The comedienne had a huge hit with "Bridesmaids," but as the star of "Welcome to Me," she takes her quirky style to a brave new level. She plays a woman with borderline personality disorder who buys her way into her own TV show. REVIEW, D3
